

Don't jump into genetic testing for breast cancer, experts say

The first thing any woman concerned about breast cancer should do is compile a family medical history, then speak with a genetic counselor about whether testing is appropriate, experts say.

Oncologist Julia Smith recommends against using direct-to-consumer genetic tests for breast cancer because curating and interpreting the results is complicated, and not all tests are equally reliable.

NBC News (12/9)